A BANK DETECTIVE'S STRANGE EXPERIENCES.

For five years I held a queer place and pursued a strange occupation. Four banks in a large city made up my business, and I employed me as a detective. I was not to look after the employees, but to investigate the business hours, hunt up information regarding patrons, and to investigate myself, in other words, I was an all detective and almost every bank robber or thief of that age was well known to me by sight. In those days the banks were poorly equipped and the investigations were in vain. Not one of the four had a time lock, and instead of a child-proof vault, had big safes set on a wooden base. Bank burglars could get into any safe in three or four hours, and bank robbers were not the least out you most today.

THE STAG FOXHOUNDS.

"The man I marry must be a Nimrod," remarked the fair Diana Trotter to Mr. Slumkins at the Damson autumn dinner. "A Nimrod?" repeated the fair Diana, leaving Mr. Slumkins as white as ever. Miss Trotter was at the time on a visit to her uncle, Major Gibbons, her home being Stag Hall, near Cornleigh, in one of the home counties, and her father, Mr. Trotter, being a member of the club, and owner of a fine pack of foxhounds, which, taking their name from their owner's residence, were known far and wide as the "Stag Hounds."
