London Letter.

At the time of writing this letter London is enjoying perhaps the most wonderful January weather we have ever known. We are having days of abundant sunshine and of soft, warm air. The trees are beginning to show signs of buds, and the light green in the parks and in the squares is as the premature herald of spring.

On Sunday morning I walked through Hyde Park. There were many hundreds of the children of the world to be seen, playing on the broad, sandal paths around the fountains, near the magnificent serpentine lake, and the magnificent water works.

One of the familiar sights about London today is the char-a-banc driven through the streets laden with convalescent wounded soldiers from the hospitals who are taking their first outing around London.

The closing of Museums. As part of the official policy of economy and protection of the national museums are to be closed almost at once. One obvious advantage of this plan is that not only will it reduce national expenditure but it will remove from the world treasures to be reconstructed by the hands of the despoilers.

The Hotel Metropole. The Hotel Metropole, the big establishment with six hundred rooms on the river end of Northumberland Avenue, is being closed as an hotel and turned into headquarters of the Municipal Department.

The Restriction of Imports. Of the three great topics of the week the most important is the restriction of imports which are bound to be of everybody's mind.

The Black Hand. An interesting and somewhat unusual phase of London life revealed itself at the Guildhall on Saturday, when nine boys from 11 to 15 years of age were charged with breaking shop windows in the city and stealing property. They had seen pictures of the chieftains of criminals in some of the cheap kinemas and had been inspired by the desire to emulate them.

When the war began on August 1, official figures were as to the number of German submarines that had been built and commissioned. It totaled just forty-five—twenty-seven submarines built and commissioned, and eighteen on the stocks.
