THE HEART OF DIANA
BY
DOROTHY M. GARRARD.
Author of "Iris," "Roger Northcote's Wife," "The Spider's Web," etc., etc.

(COPYRIGHT.)
While her mother was speaking Diana smiled—a smile of weariness. How old the tale was! All her life had she heard Lady Forrest talk gibberish of times that were to be soon paid. Never she had known her—unless it was forced from her—unpenny. Did she deceive herself, her daughter wondered, with each fresh promise? Or was it all part of the game?

"How much is it?" she asked, a little coldly. She was equally quite aware that the whole tale might be a lie at Cannes, no parsimonious Frenchman at all.
"Five thousand francs—that's roughly a hundred pounds, as the exchange stands now—a month, is the robbery, of course, but what's the do?" Lady Forrest outcried her hands expressively. "The hotels are simply ruin and, besides, I'm inclined to smile, only when she ever speak of her advancing years. I can't live in an hotel all the winter, you darling!"

"Very well." Despite her words of assent Diana's voice was cold. It was not the first time since her marriage that her mother had dipped into her purse. And she was quite determined it should not be done again. As she knew only too well, the demands would by degrees grow more and more extortionate. "But, remember, mother," she suddenly looked her mother straight in the eyes, "that is the last time. It's Derek's money, after all, and it's not for me to spend it on your extravagances!"

"My extravagances!" For an instant anger sparkled in Lady Forrest's eyes. Then quickly she got, or was going to get, what she wanted, for the time being. The future, except the immediate future, was never of any importance to her. "Of course, darling," she went on in a soothing tone, "I'm likely to have ever have to trouble you again. I'm now, heartless as it seems, I'm afraid I shall have to turn you out. But I've an engagement at Marianne's at a quarter past three. She's not running up one or two frocks in a hurry for me to take with me, and you know she won't be kept waiting."
"I must go, too." Without any regard Diana rose to her feet. "I ordered the car to come for me at three. I'll send you a cheque to-night then. By the way, for the first time she mentioned her own affairs. "Derek must go back to East Africa next week."

"Has he?" For an instant Lady Forrest threw a keen glance at her daughter. What, she wondered, instinctively guessing that something lay beneath the surface, could this mean? Then, swiftly, with a few casual words of regret, she dismissed the subject. "Anyhow, as she knew well, her daughter's money was as good as hers. Whether her husband was with her or not made no difference to that."

A few minutes later, after an effusive farewell, Diana found herself looking round the courtyard of the hotel for her own car. To her surprise, for it was now ten minutes past three, she saw a taxi cab. It was beginning to rain, and she saw the drops falling on the pavement outside, and she was wearing thin, indecent shoes. She could not walk. She stood for a moment undecided whether she should telephone home for the car, then, instead, made up her mind to take a taxi. But, just as she stepped forward to summon one from the rank, she saw a man, hat in hand, coming quickly towards her. For an instant, although she knew his face perfectly, she did not realise who he was. Then swiftly she recognised Clifford Allertoyce.

CHAPTER XI.
"Diana, what luck?" Allertoyce came quickly up to her. Before she could reply he had taken her hand. "I've been longing to see you," he went on, "but where are you off to now?"
"I am going home," she spoke coldly, dragging her hand from his grasp. "I was just going to call a taxi."
"I am just going to call a taxi," he said, "and I am going to see you." Before she could answer he had signalled to the nearest driver. The car had drawn up beside them. She could not get into it. He was holding the door open, and, as she stepped in, he followed her. She heard him give the man the address, and the next instant the door was shut and they were gone.
"Mr. Allertoyce," sharply she turned on him. "I did not ask you to come with me. If it had not been that we should have insisted that you should get out. But, if you will not now, I shall."

"I will, I promise you, if you will give me five minutes, Diana," as he turned to her, his voice, his expression had altered. "If only you knew what I've been through these last months. How I've longed, craved with my mouth and soul to see you, to beg your forgiveness. Can't you guess how I felt about you in that ghastly accident? I knew it was not my fault. Oh, but I've been punished, more than I should be, for all the sins of my life."
"I do not wish to speak of it. It is all over and done with," again her tone was cold. Yet something in his voice, the voice that she had once said was the most beautiful man's voice she had ever heard, brought dimly to her the recollection of the past, that woman had Clifford Allertoyce had been everything in the world to her.
"Then you will forgive me. And also, for the book, although that, I know, is past forgiveness. There's only one extension; when I wrote it I was mad with jealousy, and—" to get home, you see. But I sent no message, and at half-past two I was sitting with my mother in the Winter Garden at the hotel. It's rather odd, though," he added slowly.
"his voice dropped until it was scarcely heard."
"You can hardly expect me to believe that," she turned on him coldly.

"Unbidden the thought had just flown through her mind that, if the car had been there, she would not have seen Clifford Allertoyce. He would not so quickly, she asked herself the question, have sent her a message. The next instant she dismissed the idea as impossible. Even if he had seen her he could not have guessed how she meant to return, or the time she was leaving.

Andrews, his shrewd, kindly face still puzzled, had retired to the back regions. Diana herself walked to the foot of the staircase. The house seemed so quiet so deserted, that she supposed Derek and Sheila were both still out. And then, just as she had put her foot upon the bottom stair, suddenly she heard the door of the little sitting-room, the windows of which looked out upon the Square, open quickly. She saw her husband, his face set and cold, standing in the doorway.
"Diana, I wish to speak to you," his voice was quiet, but there was something in it that told of fires without smoke. "I heard you were taking Andrews about something, so I did not interrupt you. Now I shall be glad if you will spare me a few minutes."

"I heard you were taking Andrews about something, so I did not interrupt you. Now I shall be glad if you will spare me a few minutes." He stood in the door open for her to pass in. And swiftly it struck her that, from the window of the room, he must have seen her get out of the taxi with Clifford Allertoyce. He was not quick to believe in the fact that she had met him with intention. He would not believe her perhaps if she told him that the meeting was accidental. Well, she would tell him—if it was his own affair. He had, by his manner the day before, shown that her opinion was nothing to him. He should in that case be equally indifferent to his.

ST. MARY'S CARNIVAL, THORNBUARY.

(To the Editor.)
Sir,—In answer to the letter over the signature of L. Lannan, I would like to state that at the social referred to no mention was made of winners or amounts collected by the various committees during the evening. As Mr. Lannan has opened this controversy, perhaps it would be advisable to let the facts of the evening be made public through your paper. In his letter he states that the Prince and Princess of Harmony were responsible for £830/11/4; the Prince and Princess of Contentment secured £1,025/11/11. Quite correct. He then goes on to say that the Prince and Princess of Peace handed in £1,055/17/11, but he omits to mention the fact that a cheque for the greater portion of this was handed in long after the appeal closed and after the amounts collected by the other committees were already known. Probably a small cheque would not have been accepted.

To be sure these facts it was necessary to alter the figures already written on the proclamation. It was announced from the stage by a chorus of voices that, technically speaking, the Prince and Princess of Contentment had won the carnival, but in a spirit of sportsmanship they had allowed the Prince and Princess of Peace to be crowned.
Mr. Lannan also goes on to state that winners of all similar competitions are judged upon the amount they subscribe during the carnival. I admit that, but he should understand that the money paid in after an appeal has closed is always recognised as being dead money.
It is a remarkable coincidence that the cheque paid in in this manner was just sufficient to cover the amount subscribed by the Prince and Princess of Contentment.
Further comment is unnecessary. Mr. Lannan not being one of the guests of the evening could not mention the names of the hosts, proposed by Mr. McMahon. This is a matter of Mr. Keav. Lannan, a brother. The mistake was apparently a printer's error.—Yours, etc.,
L. H. ROBERTS.

THE GUN.

THE NORTHCOTE CLUB.
Though sharp showers were encountered in the early portion of Saturday afternoon at Reservoir, this did not seriously interfere with the Northcote Gun Club's starting shoot. In the opening sweepstakes six Miller and "Chronic" diverted after six kills. A similar number of rounds followed the field in the next similar event to "Fred" and J. Stoddart, who divided; while a round later the attendant ham went to "Fred." A £25 handicap attracted a large field. At the conclusion of four rounds, £1 was divided between J. Holmes (two noms.), H. E. Spry, "Meranda," "Viresco," and balance of £12 was shared equally by Spry, Holmes, "Meranda" and "Kompson."
"E.A.B." secured the final sweep with four kills. Next Saturday's programme includes a £10 sparrow handicap.
