CHAPTER XV.—Continued.

At the back of the house was an attached building, evidently a garage, dilapidated as the rest of the little property. But here it was that Mr. Velvet stopped short and gave vent to an expression of surprise as he bent down and picked up from the sandy path a half-smoked cigar. A cigar that had undoubtedly been smoked recently. No old refuse this; dry, smelling of stale Havana. Mr. Velvet's eyes kindled, and the world took on a new aspect.

"Well, I'm hanged!" he said, chuckling with delight. "The first sign of life in this morgue of a garage. And Mr. Velvet began to regard things with a suddenly awakened interest. He investigated the rusty hinges of the gate, and his examination gave him much satisfaction. It was obvious that the gate had recently been opened on several occasions. He fell to a contemplation of the sandy drive, and called the chauffeur from the perusal of the history of love and crime which he had recently read in "Le Petit Parisien" to give him his opinion on half-obliterated wheel marks with the result that they both came to the conclusion that a motor car had passed in and out in the not-distant past. The chauffeur in turn suggested that there were considerable signs of an automobile on the road outside the gate. He discovered patches of oil and signs of a car turning.

Mr. Velvet investigated the garage in company with the chauffeur, who thoroughly entered into the spirit of the chase. The garage had most obviously not been used for a long time. The doors were bolted and the locks and bars were rusty. They looked into the interior through a cobwebbed window. It had the appearance of long neglect. Then Mr. Velvet's spirits fell. After all, the recently half-smoked cigar—a good Havana, he judged it to be—and obviously not long smoked—suggested that there were considerable signs of an automobile on the road outside the gate. He discovered patches of oil and signs of a car turning.

"Look here, m'sieu," he cried excitedly, rushing round from the back of the house. "This is a door which is evidently often used—doubtless by the custodian. It is a door which appears to lead into the kitchen quarters. And there are signs of a dog having been about. And there are odds and ends of matches and bits of paper. He struck an attitude. "Ah, m'sieu," he said, "I always know I have been born to be a detective. I have the keen eye, I observe the little things that may mean so much. Ever since I read 'Monsieur Lecoq' when I was a small boy I have ever desired to be a detective. Observe, m'sieu, here is a torn piece of a newspaper. The Scotsman. It is but four days old." Mr. Velvet examined the torn piece of newspaper which the chauffeur produced. This was certainly very extraordinary. How on earth had a portion of a four-day-old "Scotsman" come to the derelict Chaff House in the sand dunes of the North of France?

Velvet followed the chauffeur to the kitchen door. Undoubtedly here were signs of recent life. He tried to get a glimpse through a small barred but unshuttered window, but the thick glass was frosted and nothing could be seen.

"We must have a look inside," said Mr. Velvet.

"M'sieu," exclaimed the chauffeur dubiously, "but how can it be done?"

Velvet took a general survey, followed like a faint beam of light by the chauffeur. "Well, try the door first of all," said Velvet, producing a curious contraption from his pocket that looked at first sight like a cross between a safety razor and a mallet, and he experimented laboriously with skeleton keys. In vain. The lock gave. He turned it open and shut. But the door was bolted—bolted from the inside.

"Which means," said the chauffeur breathlessly, "that someone is in the house."

"Or," said Velvet, in a positive ecstasy of professional excitement, "that there is some other exit."

That gave Anatole, which was the name of the chauffeur—Anatole Vert, as he vouchsafed to Mr. Velvet—cause to think deeply. "But, m'sieu," he gasped, "this is a thing which stupefies me. This becomes most intriguing, does it not?"

Mr. Velvet agreed, meanwhile he had his eye on a shuttered window just above his head, the shutter of which appeared to be flapping slightly loose from its fastenings.

It may have been imagination—and Mr. Velvet was certainly no imaginationist—that he saw a light glimmer from that or it may have been a fact; but it seemed for a moment as if Mr. Velvet saw a tense, white face peering down at him from the aperture caused by the flapping shutter, a sinister, evil face.

Be that as it may, Mr. Velvet's right hand slipped under the tails of his coat and found his hip-pocket and gripped a bulky Colt automatic, releasing the safety catch.

"Look here, my friend," he said to Anatole. "Get on my shoulders and see if you can open that window."

"But, certainly, m'sieu," exclaimed Anatole, keen as Punch. Then Mr. Velvet suddenly changed his mind. No. Why should the impatient Anatole get his brains blown out? It was Velvet's job. He was used to taking risks. It was the life's blood of him. If there was to be dirty business—well, he was the last to shrink. He thought he had put up the cheery Anatole to test the strength of the enemy! Perish the very idea.

"Anatole, mon ami," he said, "you bend down. It is I who will do the burglary."

Velvet found that the shutter opened easily, found also that the window was open. In a second he was over the window-sill and into a large bed-room but dimly lighted. He swept the room with a swift, trained glance. It was empty. There was nowhere where a man might hide, save under the bed. He looked under the bed, but no one was there. He opened a big wardrobe—it was bare. A dank, musty smell of empty and deserted rooms pervaded everything. Furniture was covered with canvas wrappings. Carpets and rugs were rolled up. Pictures were swathed. Only one—a large fifteenth century Italian picture of the Flight into Egypt—looked as if it might be very valuable in its elaborate Florentine frame—loomed ghostly out of the gloom.

FOR THE LADIES PRINCESS SLIPS

Modern styles demand dainty undies, and it is upon this subject we have our little chat for this week. The success of lingerie depends upon the excellence of the fabric and fabric, and this applies in particular to princess slips, which are necessary adjuncts to our well-trimmed, no matter what size or size we are. Our illustration shows two princess slips, both in the narrow slim line effect necessary for wearing under the frills of jumpers of the present day. Both styles will admit themselves to many uses being suitable for wearing as a costume slip for wearing beneath a tailored coat forming a charming ensemble.

These slips can also be worn with flannel material, in which case the bottom part would be faced up on the outside as far as required, with the same material.

In No. 2 the skirt part could be of dress material, the whole forming a smock. Often the top part is made of flannel or floral silk, giving the appearance of a dress or jumper which may be worn open for a few inches from the hem upwards if desired. The silk or satin, but light material would be used for making up the slips with every success. The hem and neck should be spokesitched. The sides may be left open for a few inches from the hem upwards if desired. The silk or satin, but light material would be used for making up the slips with every success. The hem and neck should be spokesitched. The sides may be left open for a few inches from the hem upwards if desired.

No. 2 shows a slip made with a long bow, to which the skirt part is joined. It is made up in black silk or crepe de Chine, and is trimmed with fine val lace and insertion.

The pattern is No. 285, price 5d; sizes medium and one size, and can be obtained from any of the agents shown in the list in another part of this paper, send 9d. to the manufacturer, De-marets, Stewart Street, Richmond, for new illustrated catalogue of late designs.

RIFLE SHOOTING. 57TH BATTALION (PRESTON) SUCCESSFUL

At the Williamstown rifle range on Saturday the 57th Battalion (Preston) keenly contested a shoot with the 4th Battalion (the Shire) for the Carlton United Cup which the 57th will hold for 12 months. Conditions were good, and eventually the 57th won the cup by a narrow margin of 10 points.

The 57th Battalion—207 (Sergeant Matthews 39, Lieutenant Jones 31, Sergeant McDonald 28, Cadet Willshire 26, Sergeant Crawford 22, Cadet Bourke 22, Lieutenant George 22, Sergeant Webb 20).

6th Battalion.—197 (Sergeant George 37, Corporal Garing 27, C.S.M. Stevenson 26, C.G.M.S. Pruden 24, 25, Corporal Alderman 24, Sergeant Owen 20, Private Crowley 19, Corporal Stampler 16).

The Carlton United Cup is a perpetual trophy, and is competed for under "honorarium" conditions.
