The hair and the hat... problem was placed before her this is the answer to give. The hair is very simple. The modiste and the dressmaker must collaborate.

The hair is allowed to grow only as far as necessary at the sides and particularly at the nape. As a matter of fact, when the hair is too long over the nape and the results are unsatisfactory.

1ST NORTHCOTE TROOP

Last Saturday afternoon a football match was played against the 1st Preston Troop, and after a good game the final scores were: Preston 8 goals 21 behinds (89 points); Northcote 8 goals 3 behinds (39 points). Six members of the troop were on the attending lectures of the St. John Ambulance Society for an examination last Monday and all six received well over the points necessary for the certificate, one gaining the possible number of points. The patrol leaders have decided that the time has come for the troop to have a magazine of its own, and it is now no thing unusual to be held up by an amateur reporter (complete with notebook and pencil) with a request for an interview. Several interesting letters have been received from S.M.

(By Aquas.) The much discussed and eagerly awaited return match between Northcote and Brunswick took place last Saturday at Northcote Park.

no mistake. Wilson and Higgins at one end and Blackmore at the other were the star performers. A free to lay, placed McInerney in possession, but he failed miserably, gaining a point only. Brunswick's hopes dropped again, whilst their supporters groaned. Pruser also added a point, just before the close Harry scored and goalied, while Pruser added a point. Final scores—

NORTHCOTE—15 goals 11 behinds (101 points).
BRUNSWICK—8 goals 12 behinds (60 points).

PRESTON NOW HOLD FOURTH POSITION

CAMBERWELL LAG BEHIND.

PRESTON FORWARDS FAIL TO SECURE OPPORTUNITIES.

(By "Follower") Preston were at home to Camberwell last Saturday, when they inflicted a rather decided thrashing on their visitors. By doing so the locals now hold fourth position on the premier ship list, which honor they will do their utmost to retain. Preston made two last minute changes, Miller, who where should she go? Home to mother? Claire shuddered. Too much like cheap melodrama—weeping, dagger, disappointed with wedded life, returns to family fold. "Not this child!" thought Claire. Should she ring up one or other of the "gang," the set of Jolly, ever-ready young people who were her friends? No, she did not feel in the mood for any of them, and, besides, they would want to know why Terry had not turned up, too.

And all the while she was but temporising, trying to gain, trying to drown the memory of that fascinating voice, saying only a few short weeks ago, "Any time, my dearest, that you are at all bored, do let me know. I shall be so charmed to try and amuse you. Will you remember, Claire?" It was so hard, too, to try and forget Terry's pleading, loving and protective, when he held her in his arms that very same night and begged, "Darling, don't trust Ronald Kirby, and please don't see more of him than you can help. He's no good, sweetheart, will love you too much to have you talked about. Will you promise?"

Claire had felt drowsy and happy, a little tired after the dance, and she had promised sleepily—she would have promised anything on earth that night.

"But now Terry does not love me any more like that; he just wants a silly old housekeeper, and I'll not be one and I am more than bored. Ronald's amusing and will give me a good time, and not worry me about food."

Claire ran to the telephone—she might change her mind if she did not hurry. She found the number, asked for it, and then, waiting, she very nearly gave it up. Her knees trembled abjectly, and there was a choking sensation at the back of her throat. She was going to put her receiver when a voice at the other end arrested her.

"Is Mr. Kirby there? He's not? Oh, it does not matter—no, no message. What did you say? Oh, Mr. Aylmer speaking. No, it's quite all right, thank you."

So that was that. Claire turned a rather reluctant back on the telephone and went back to her room. But soon the telephone bell rang.

Claire wanted to ignore it—let it ring—but a telephone bell is a curiously persistent thing and will not be denied attention.

"Hallo," very irritably from Claire. "Oh, Mr. Kirby—yes, I did, but someone told me you weren't in." Followed a lengthy explanation at the other end of the wire during which waves of scarlet swept Claire's face and neck. From time to time she interrupted with a little gurgle of laughter and ejaculations, and at last, "Oh, all right, then, it will be rather fun. No thanks, I'd rather you didn't—I'll come down. When? Oh, I'll not be long. Good-bye."

"Click" went the receiver on to its hook, and that was another "that."

Again Claire ran to her room, but this time she had no thought for Terry's clothes lying in rather a pathetic heap on the bed. She flung open her wardrobe and rummaged among her clothes. Motoring to Maidstone—well, she would need something warm, though the spring sunshine was warm, and for the river she would wear her new scarlet jumper suit. Terry had made a fuss about that one. "Darling, I can't possibly afford so many new dresses for you yet." And when she said her father would pay for it, Terry had been ridiculously angry. But the suit was a great success, setting off the lovely lines of Claire's slim, young figure to perfection, and providing a splendid offset for her dark hair and bright coloring. She slipped into a warm blue coat, pulled a small scarf but on to her curls, and wound a scarlet scarf around the slender column of her throat; snatched up gloves and bag, and, without a backward look, eager for the day's adventure, she left the house, slamming the door behind her.

Rose heard the hurried exit and ran to the window. Her young mistress' scarlet had could just be seen above the next door garden's laurel hedge.

"My, she does seem to be in a hurry, and she never did say good-bye to me, same as she allus does. An' what wud the master say, 'er not 'ome an' all." Rose shook her head and clattered back to the kitchen. While washing up the breakfast dishes she decided she would never treat her "Enry like that—no fear, she wouldn't."

Claire hurried down their little suburban street, and turned into the main road. She had not gone far when a smart roadster, painted and metal work glistening in the spring sunshine, hooted lowered, pulled up by the kerb. Ronald Kirby jumped out, and, with hat lifted and hand outstretched, he went to meet Claire. He really looked very attractive and so distinguished, thought Claire. His dark hair was sleekly brushed back and grey eyes looked tenderly, deferentially into her dark ones.

"Why, this is delightful, Claire! I may call you that for that is how I always think of you—may I?"

Claire dropped her eyes for an instant, then lifted her head with a defiant air, and the color very bright in her face, she said, "Oh, of course, Ronald, we're friends—are't we?"

Ronald laughed, a little triumphantly, but not enough so for Claire to notice. "You glorious little thing," he said.

Solicitously he handed her into the car, tucked the rug carefully round her legs, lingering over the task with a deference that was particularly soothing to her outraged dignity. Here was somebody, she was sure, who would never grumble about burnt bacon.

OUR SERIAL STORY
"Burnt Bacon"
By BERTIE WINKLER
"Dash it all, Claire, you might at least try and give a chap a decent breakfast."
Terry Aylmer's clean, good-humored face wore a scowl as he eyed the burnt bacon and unappetising eggs with distaste.
His young wife was busy giving an extra twist to her pretty dark curls.
"It's not my fault that I can't have proper servants."
"But, Claire—"
"I know! You think I ought to do things myself, and work myself to bits. Then, perhaps, you'd be satisfied!"
"Don't be so silly, Claire."
"I'm not silly—it's you! You ought to have married a housekeeper, not me. I'm sick of having to look at every penny, and I don't intend to get old and ugly, and never have any fun. Why should I? You—you don't really care for me, and—and I'm sorry I ever married you!"
Two bright spots of color burned in Claire's cheeks, and her eyes were dark with unshed tears—tears of temper and resentment. Terry had risen at her last words, flung his table napkin on the table and walked to the door. Then he turned and hesitated, but Claire's back was towards him; he went out and slammed the door. Mechanically he picked up his hat and reached for his stick. Still no sign from Claire. It felt very lonely walking to the gate by himself.
And Claire? Out of the corner of one eye she watched Terry go down the street—a pretty suburban street, where neat front gardens were gay with flowers, where young trees, guarded and tended, did their best to transform the street into an avenue.
Claire watched Terry's retreating form. His walk was not so buoyant, and there was no happy waving of hat or stick. But, then, Terry was really quite impossible. He could not expect her to be a working housekeeper, and she would not be bullied about food. Food! What did food matter when they loved each other. It was perfectly ridiculous to make such a fuss about a bit of burnt bacon.
Terry badly needed a lesson on how to treat his young wife, decided Claire.
She had been brought up in a luxurious home where perfect service, beautiful things, pretty clothes and money to spend on anything that took her fancy, were matters so ordinary that one never thought about them. Claire had always done as she liked, her father and mother being too preoccupied with their own affairs to give much thought and effort to the training of their only daughter. "Claire is all right," they would say to themselves. "She is pretty, she has nice manners and a sweet way with
