Northcote Down Preston in Hard Rugged Game

V.F.F. SECOND SEMI-FINAL

A VARYING AND STRIKING CONTACT PUT UP. GREAT GAME MARRIED BY RAIN. GREEN AND GOLD STILL REIGN OF CHALLENGE

(By Follows)
In the presence of 15,000 spectators, Northcote met Preston at Brimbank on Saturday in the second semi-final of the V.F.F. A hard, rugged, and exciting game was played, with Northcote prevailing by a score of 14 to 10. The game was marred by rain, but the spectators were not deterred. Northcote's forwards were particularly effective, and their defence stood up well to Preston's attack. The game was a real test of strength and endurance for both teams.

THE TEAMS
Northcote: Backs: Wilson, Cook, Wood, Peters; Forwards: Taylor, Seymour, Hill, Campbell, Grogan, McCall, O'Brien, halfbacks: Grogan, McCall, O'Brien; fullbacks: Grogan, McCall, O'Brien.

AT NORTHCOLE HEAD-QUARTERS.
That confident feeling which had been the result of the triumph of Saturday's triumph against the staunch rival, Preston, was evident in the confidence of the players. The team was well prepared for the match, and they showed their skill and determination throughout the game.

LATEST NOTES FROM THE FIELD
(By Aegaeus)
After last Saturday's triumph against the staunch rival, Preston, every one is confident that Northcote will see the close of the season. The team's performance was exceptional, and they showed their skill and determination throughout the game.

PRESTON TOOK THE LEAD
Preston were the first to move when Adams scored a single. The game was a real test of strength and endurance for both teams. Northcote's forwards were particularly effective, and their defence stood up well to Preston's attack. The game was marred by rain, but the spectators were not deterred.

THE LONG And Short of It

Among the many questions that women ask themselves, one of the most common is "What is the long and short of it?"

A CURE FOR SNORING. Is there a "reliable, painless, and harmless cure or remedy for the terribly distressing affliction of snoring?"

"Burnt Bacon"

By BERTIE WINKLER

She was still asleep when he got up the next morning. He moved softly so as not to disturb her, and when he peeped into the room just before leaving for the city she had not yet wakened.

"I'll give her a surprise and come home for lunch," he thought, and his mind pictured a certain dinner party where he had seen lovely sprays of mimosa the day before. He knew how Claire loved the soft fragrant little balls, and only they were so frightfully expensive, but—day—later it all, he'd been a brute to her, and she should have something—well, something one did not give to one's house-keeper.

Claire's sleep had been fitful and broken. She had been troubled by dreams of some vague disaster. She had wakened long before Terry, but because she did not want to speak to him she had pretended to be asleep. She waited a few moments after she heard Terry get up, and then got up. Looking round the breakfast room, flooded with morning sunshine, she remembered that this was the last time she would see him in a moving picture on her mind. Something hurt at the thought. Did she really do it? Could she leave Terry—her poor Terry? This was the familiar dent Terry's head had made in the pillow. The familiar disorder of his hurried dressing. The familiar would have a dressing room and Terry—she had never stepped loving her ever such a long time ago. He had kissed her before leaving—Ronald, who had never kissed her a kiss. The memory of Ronald's kisses in the darkness of the night drew the hot blood to her cheeks. What a wonderful, glorious time she would have had if she had been lost in rose-tinted dream until a knock brought her to earth.

"Please'm, what will I order from the restaurant with the gas man 'as called with the bill."

"Botheration!" Claire frowned. For a moment she had the last time Claire reminded herself of the angry argument you like, Rose, and the master will send a check for me."

"Yes'm," said Rose, a baffled look on her plain, honest face, and clattered away.

An hour later, bathed and dressed, and carrying a small suitcase, Claire walked down the garden path, closed the gate behind her, then hurried to the main road to catch the bus to the city—for the last time. In future there would be Ronald's car to take her about, and no more waiting for an empty house that evening. Odd how the thought of Terry would intrude upon her dreams of a glorious future. Before long she would have a marvellous career, and she would never waste a penny, who would not after that and she would never ask for anything or be disappointed. Claire smiled grimly. All the same, the thought of a woman who had looked after Terry hurt—

There was a small party at the entrance of the building when Ronald came out of a taxi, who directed her to the lift. Claire noticed the deference, but missed the knowing look bestowed on the lift attendant. The lift doors opened, and Claire found herself standing before the door of Ronald's flat. A woman, who had been waiting outside, stepped forward. Supposing Ronald was out, she thought she would go in if it was possible. She was summoned by a manservant, who had been waiting for her.

"What name?" she asked.
"Miss Mather."

"What name?" she asked.
"Miss Mather."

"My darling, I've spent a wretched night wondering if you would come, afraid that you would have changed your mind and leave me lonely and unhappy. But you are here now, and all's well."

"He had Claire to the sofa, took off her hat and coat, and kissed her again."

"Happy darling?" he asked her tenderly.

"Yes," said Claire with a sigh.

They talked, making plans for the future. First of all they would travel, and everything that might be just a

NORTHCOTE RED CROSS AUXILIARY.

The seventh annual meeting of the Northcote Red Cross Auxiliary was held in the town hall, Northcote, on Tuesday afternoon. The mayor (Mr. W. Hayes) was in the chair, and welcomed Mrs. G. C. McPherson and Mrs. G. Sheppard (Preston Red Cross), Mrs. H. Hayden and Mrs. H. C. Dyeal, who spoke of her work as a go-between linking the ex-patient and the hospital. She complimented the ladies on the splendid work they were giving to the Malbourne Hospital. Mrs. Bell thanked the members for their ever-ready practical help, and wished the auxiliary every success. Miss Robertson ably outlined the work the Red Cross was still doing for returned soldiers, and referred to little unpleasant had blown over, and then they could get married.

"It'll be all right, won't it?" asked Claire a little pitiously. "I mean, about getting married afterwards?"
"My darling, how can you doubt it? Do you know, you hurt me when you talk like that."
"Forgive me, Ronald, but I am a little scared."
"Scared—with me?"
"Not with you, dear, but, but—"
"No buts, darling. You know I love you and would not harm you for anything in the world. Unfortunately we can't get married without that bit of bother first, but it shan't touch you, sweetheart."

"Ronald, when we're married, will you always think the same of me as you do now? You won't remember the way I came to you, and make me sorry?"
"You adorable, silly little baby! As if I could ever stop loving you and thinking all the world of you."
Claire snuggled into his arms, comforted and reassured. As on the day before, his nearness, his kisses dispelled all doubts and fears.

But what was that? The man's voice could be heard saying something in the hall; then a woman's voice, raised in anger—or despair:
"I know he is in and I mean to see him. Stand back, if you please." Again the man's voice, and then the heavy door was flung open.

A woman, fashionably dressed, with an air of mature loveliness, came into the room. Her eyes, burning in a very white face, took in the scene in an instant. Claire, utterly confused, had jumped from the sofa and was now standing with her back to the window, one hand at her throat, her dark eyes dilated. Ronald had gained his composure in a scarce perceptible moment.

"How do you do?" he said, but his face was hard, his eyes glinted like steel.

The lady's gaze did not falter and now she had her voice under control. It was low and quiet, but so charged with unhappiness that the sound of it sent a shiver through Claire. They seemed to have forgotten her. What was the unhappy voice saying? Something about a husband who had found out, divorce papers—coming to Ronald because, oh, God forgive her, she loved him so—because he had promised— Was it Ronald who had promised something to the lady with the unhappy voice? Ronald, who only a few short moments ago—or was it ages and ages—had loved her, Claire; had kissed her and promised her. Now Ronald was speaking, but it did not sound like him, so angry and contemptuous was his voice.

Unable to bear it any longer Claire stumbled forward, a desperate fear almost suffocating her. "I don't understand," she cried. "What has happened? Why is he here saying these things? Ronald, tell me—oh, you must!"

The lady looked at Claire. There was pity in her beautiful eyes as she noticed the wedding ring on Claire's hand and the wild look in her face.

"You too," she said softly. "Go back, child, if it is not too late."

"What do you mean?" flamed Claire, resenting the pity. "Ronald, please explain."

"Sit!" ordered the lady, and Ronald, who was about to speak, kept silent. "Listen, child," she went on, "at a time when my husband and I were not very happy together I met Ronald. No need to tell you of his fascination. I fell in love for the first time in my life, strange as it may seem. But up to then my life had been full of everything except love." Her voice dropped very low, and Claire listened in awed silence. "I love him still, and I always shall, but I don't trust him any more. He persuaded me to leave my husband, and when I aching for love and understanding, did it for him he no longer had any use for me." She turned her lovely face away to hide the despair in her eyes. "Now I have lost everything."

Claire faced Ronald. "Is that true?"

"Claire, my dear, please let me explain."

"It is true, then? Oh, I know it is! You—you beastly cad!"

Claire snatched up her hat and bag and flung herself out of the room. Not waiting for the lift, she ran down the stairs and out into the street.

Claire never quite knew afterwards how she got home, but there was Terry standing in the hall, his arms full of golden sprays of mimosa. Somehow Terry and the mimosa and Claire herself got all mixed up, and she was sobbing out the whole pitiful story

It was quite an appreciable time later that Terry heard a small, sob-choked voice murmur into his coat—
"Terry, darling. I'll never ever burn your bacon again!"

(The End.)

THE GRAPEFRUIT SPOON.

Recently a woman bought a case of spoons at a sale. Among them she discovered one with a saw-edge, and she wanted to know what it was for. This is undoubtedly a grapefruit spoon. Grapefruit has to be prepared before being eaten, and the pulp is most easily separated from the rind by the use of one of these spoons. If you are serving grapefruit before a meal you will find the tinned grapefruit much easier to prepare. More, since it is already skinned and sliced, it is easier to eat and is quite as good in flavor as the fresh. Serve it in wide stemmed glasses and finish with a cherry. Before dividing up the portions, turn into a large basin and mix your sugar into it. This will bring out the flavor and obviate the use of sugar when serving. A good grapefruit cocktail is made by pouring a little sherry over the fruit.

The "Leader" Fashion Service

The following patterns were designed in Melbourne for "Leader" readers. They are accurate and can be thoroughly relied upon, and may be obtained with instructions for the small sum of 1/- post free from "Leader" Fashion Service, 309 High Street, Northcote, Victoria. Number and bust measurement should be given when ordering.

2976.—Now that summer is coming apace, Tennis frocks will be needed. Above is shown a charming design in full, which opens out flat to facilitate ironing. The pleats in the skirt give freedom for quick movement, and the belt finishes the top of the pleats. The sizes are S.W. and medium.

3014.—Here is depicted a simple little frock useful for any occasion, and equally effective in the heavier or flatter materials. Maroon, with a contrasting shade for cuffs, collar and belt, add a daintiness, and the pleats in front give extra width to the skirt. Obtainable in medium and out-sizes.

3033.—This smart beret for keeping the hair tidy while motoring or boating may be made to match or tone with the frock. The fancy and vivid scarf is also an attractive addition to your costume. Sizes of head measurement for berets are 21, 22 and 23 inches.
