CHAPTER II.—Continued.
The girl joyfully agreed. "Yes, that's what I mean exactly," she said. "Now I've done half of the scheme to get them back, and I want you to do the rest. I've told him to bring the letters down to the Grand Hotel at Brighton, tomorrow, and will buy them at his own price. Of course, I'm not going to Brighton at all, but he'll go down by the train I mentioned. He'll have the letters in a bag because there's so many, and he'll take the bag into the carriage with him because it is so valuable. The bag is a brown one, about so big, and she stretched out her pretty fingers to show the size, "with brass fittings, and the initials 'W. A.' in black on top, and there's the man's photograph. Now, haven't I arranged things splendidly?"
The editor gazed at the photograph of the man she had laid in front of him.
"But," he said, "what's the object of it all? How can I help you?"
"How can you help me?" she replied in calm amazement. "Why, don't you see? Steal the bag."
"Steal the bag?" he repeated, his hair almost standing on end at the bare idea. "Steal it?"
"Of course. You as an editor must know how often it's done. Get one made just like it, have the same initials painted on it, and take it with the letters in it, and leave him yours. Why, I've read about it in your own paper. I'm sure there was something just like it in the 'Comet' a little while ago."
"But, my dear young lady, the mere fact of our printing piece news does not make me an expert bag-snatcher."
The girl looked disappointed.
"But there," she continued with a bright smile. "I know you'll do all you can for me. Won't you, now?"
"But my dear Miss Norreys—"
"Oh, do," she said. "Say you will."
She stretched out her hand, and irritating laugh that it would be if you were."
"Of course I'm not," he answered. "I've just got an idea how to get your letters back and give them a little scamp a fright into the bargain. That's what I'm laughing at, and will make him laugh, too, on the other side."
"I knew you'd be able to. I shall leave it confidently to you. Good-bye. You'll write and tell me directly you get them, won't you?"
"Of course," but read the "Comet" every evening."
When his visitor had gone the editor had changed his coat again, picked up the scattered proofs, put the photograph of the man in his drawer, and after a moment's pause rang the bell for his secretary.
"You're quite right, Gilbert," he said as the young man stood beside his desk. "He is an exceedingly attractive young man, she has surely guessed," he continued sweetly, "that you can do her a very great favor."
"She might have mentioned it to me herself," the secretary answered with a consistent hearty laugh.
"She didn't like to, Gilbert. She wished to approach an older man first. She has talked it over with me, and I've told her that I'm sure you'll be only too pleased to do it."
"Do what?"
"Well, nothing much, only—steal a Gladstone bag."
The secretary was about to protest, only his chief hurriedly continued: "Old game, you know, one bag exactly like another; you get into the same railway carriage, then change the bags, get in hurriedly, and leave you and if you're caught, I'll say you've been strange in your manner for a long time past, and you'll get off all right. Even if they don't believe it it will only mean a pretty fourteen days, and that's nothing at all to oblige a princess. They would not commit you for a first offence."
"I say," the other said presently, "it is simple."
The editor sat at his desk scribbling, and presently blew up a speaking-tube at his elbow. A gurgling came in reply. "Come down at once," said the editor, and a few minutes afterwards the head printer entered, and was speedily given details of a matter the editor required to be carried out.
One of two other people were also informed at the same time as to the parts they were to play in the melodrama that the editor had prepared. "For one night only," to oblige the princess, and in which the secretary and printer were to take leading parts.

III.
It was late the following afternoon when the editor, who had sent his secretary off earlier in the day, arrived upon the Brighton platform, where he noticed a dapper little man, carrying a brown Gladstone bag with the letters "W.A." upon it, who was just entering a first-class carriage. Two men were before him, and he took a vacant corner seat and placed his bag by his side.
One was evidently a country doctor, the other the regulation business man who lives in Brighton, and runs up to town daily. Another gentleman of somewhat sporting appearance entered, and the editor followed. The door was banged, the Brighton train started, and ran to Croydon.
At Croydon the editor glanced from the window, and a few seconds after a boy with gilt letters on his cap sprang upon the footboard of the carriage.
"Evening paper?" he exclaimed to the doctor, but the gentleman shook his head.
"No charge, sir; given away for advertisement."
"Dear, dear," exclaimed the medical gentleman, and he graciously took the copy offered to him.
The editor and the sporting gentleman also took one at the same price. The dapper gentleman with the bag wanted one too, but the free copy had been exhausted. The train started next stop: Preston Park.
"What will these papers do next?" the doctor murmured to the editor. "Fancy giving the copies away. Well, dear, dear!"
They unfolded their sheets, and a few seconds after the editor saw a shiver run all through the little doctor's slender frame.
"Oh, good gracious!" that gentleman murmured, and although both windows were closed his paper shook as if smitten by a wintry wind. His nerves, for a medical man, were badly shaken.
The editor glanced into the doctor's face, on which beads of perspiration were standing, and followed the indication of his finger, which pointed tremblingly to a few lines in the stop-press column.
THE ARCHIST IN LONDON
Antonio Bolero, the anarchist, who has sworn vengeance against London, is said to have reached here, despite the vigilance of the police. He is a dapper little man, with sharp features and a carefully-trimmed and waxed moustache. He is going by the name of William Arnold, so great is his indignation that he has gone so far as to have the letters "W.A." painted on the brown bag in which he carries his bombs.
The editor glanced round the carriage. The dapper little man was lost to his sight behind his "Evening Star," but the other two were glaring with eyes that almost protruded from their sockets at the editor by his own admission. He is a dapper little man, with sharp features and a carefully-trimmed and waxed moustache. He is going by the name of William Arnold, so great is his indignation that he has gone so far as to have the letters "W.A." painted on the brown bag in which he carries his bombs.
The editor glanced at the name of a station as they flew through it, and with a gasping, forced exclamation, "You're a dapper little man, who would have given you the name of the big black letters 'W.A.' pointed upon it."

GOOD FOR WIRELESS!
It is often said that wireless is driving people away from meetings, and that we are becoming more stay-at-home. This may be, and if the effect is to take us more and more into the open air, so much the better. But it would seem that when we do get out, we are, thanks to wireless, made much more intelligent, or at least, so the Marquis of Linlithgow says in a London paper.
"Like many other speakers at election meetings, I have been conscious of some more element in the attitude of public audiences towards political speeches. This takes the shape of close attention combined with a noticeable absence of violent reaction, friendly or hostile. And there is to be observed an increased readiness to follow and to grasp an argument. I am persuaded that this new mood and new capacity for close and silent attention on the part of public audiences is due, in the main, to the educative effect of wireless broadcasting which is as yet hardly appreciated. And I hope that speakers in the Conservative cause will not allow their servative caution not to allow their ardour to be dimmed by any fear that they are boring their audiences, but that they will continue, in plain English, and of sufficient length, to explain the proposals of the opposition parties. If they do so they will do good. Close attention, friendly or hostile, is a conscious reaction—a euphemism, we presume, for absence of rotten eggs and other signs of vocal reaction brought to its democratic apogee—except that, on the other hand, the last few sentences would seem to suggest that the B.B.C. and its associates have somehow or other rather effectively dampened the ardour of the Conservative cause. Here in Australia, however, judging by recent elections, it is the other way round."
So we may expect a lot of educating from wireless. Close attention, friendly or hostile, is a conscious reaction—a euphemism, we presume, for absence of rotten eggs and other signs of vocal reaction brought to its democratic apogee—except that, on the other hand, the last few sentences would seem to suggest that the B.B.C. and its associates have somehow or other rather effectively dampened the ardour of the Conservative cause.
